

The first time I met him...
was on a bench outside the emergency room.

He was sitting there —
holding his violin, head down,
still as a statue, lost in silence.

He looked up and asked me,
"Doctor, how long will it take for my broken hand to heal?"

I never thought...
that question would become the beginning of the longest melody in my life.

Later, I learned —
he was a famous violinist.
Cold-tempered, distant...
rarely speaking to anyone.

But somehow... every time he came back for a check-up,
we always ended up talking —
about pain, about music... and about loneliness.

He once told me I was different.
That my voice sounded like a cello —
calm, steady, warm —
like the sound of home from his childhood.

My life had always been like a medical report —
clear, predictable,
written and controlled by my parents.

But he...
he was like music itself —
free.

For the first time,
he made me wonder —
could I live for myself?

I helped him recover.
He taught me to play the violin.

The sound between the bow and the strings...
became a memory I knew I'd carry with me
for the rest of my life.

Slowly... our relationship changed.
It became soft.
It became sweet.

I thought...
we could keep walking like that forever.

But fate...
didn't give us enough time.

An unexpected engagement
forced me to leave him.

And he... he didn't ask me to stay.

That day, he shattered his bow.
I knew... that was him cutting off every path
that could lead back to me.

Later...
he went abroad —
became an even greater artist.

I once went to see him perform, in secret.
But I never showed myself.

Maybe for us...
never meeting again
was the most graceful farewell.

Until that sudden tragedy —
that violent act in the hospital —
took my life away.

Thank you...
for reading these words I left behind,
buried in the things I could never say.

And if you're still listening —

"I never blamed you.
I was just... too afraid.
Too afraid to face you.
Too afraid to face myself."

I thought leaving was the kindest thing I could do for you.

But now I know...
leaving without saying anything —
only turned love
into the deepest regret I've ever known.

I'm sorry, Samuel.

If there is another life...
I hope I'll be braver.

Brave enough to stay.

Brave enough to love.

Brave enough to never lose you again.